ecological approach to career counseling, the focus typically remains the client, but the goals and methods of the ecological career counselor are explicitly intended to shape optimal person-environmental interactions for individuals to develop vocationally (Conyne et al 2000) The environment represents an essential body of information about opportunities, rewards, and obstacles that

CAREER COUNSELING

The person-environment-fit approach to career counseling has often been characterized as assuming that the career counselor's role is simply to offer "expert" advice based on knowledge of the client and of work opportunities It has also been criticized for ignoring the processes leading up to a career decision and later career development and focusing too much on initial occupational
